WHY, THAT'S YOU, POPPY! YOU'RE A HERO AN A MOVIE ACTOR!

Y-Y-YES! AT L-L-LAST!

By the time she got her nightie she was crying. She dressed in a hurry, grabbing a dressing gown off the rack and scrambled across the window. On the way morning it was still raining.

Patricia was eating breakfast when Percy rang the doorbell. He was dressed in his raincoat and boots and his round pink face was excited under his sou'wester hat.

"The river's flooding," Percy announced breathlessly. "I was just on my bicycle. I came to see if you were all right."

Patricia nodded. She didn't want to go out in the rain.

"It's very high," she suggested.

But Percy wanted to go. He was so eager that, finally, Patricia consented. She buttoned herself in her rain clothes, and they hurried toward the river at the edge of the village.

This river was usually only a wide, peaceful creek in the summer. The children swam and fished in its quiet water. In the winter they sledded on its smooth ice.

But this morning it was no longer the friendly creek. It was a wild, savage river. Angry, surging water. The grassy banks where Patty and Peter had had so many picnics were completely hidden under a brown, swirling sheet of water.

"It looks like a lake," Patricia gasped when she saw it.

"It's past our houses and it's up to the garden," Percy said with a sigh.

"Oh, no!" Patricia agreed. Suddenly she clutched Percy's arm. "Why, do you suppose has happened to Peter Pig and his family? They live very down in the hollow, close to the river."

"Let's go and see," Percy suggested quickly. "Maybe they've forgotten about them."

They followed the curve of the river, carefully keeping out of reach of the curling edges of the water. Their boots squished in the thick mud as they trudged on and on. After a while the village was far behind them, and they were nearing the hollow where Peter Pig's family lived in a tumble-down shack on the banks of the river.

They rounded a bend. There was the hollow. But where was Peter's house?

Then they saw it, and they both gasped. It was no longer on the river's edge [illegible] ...ing [illegible] ...ter, which churned and foamed [illegible] ...ound it. And it was no longer a house [illegible] ...was merely a peaked roof, sticking up [illegible] ...of the flood.

Peter, his mother and father and his [illegible] ...sisters and brothers were huddled on the [illegible] ...roof out of reach of the water.

"How [illegible] ...these," We can't hang on [illegible] ...much longer!" Peter shouted when [illegible] ...he saw Perry and Petunia "Nobody [illegible] ...can swim in that flood."

"[illegible] ...get back and get [illegible] ...home." Perry shouted across the wide stretch [illegible] ...of rushing water.

"You stay here, Petunia," he shouted. "I'll go as fast as I can." He turned and scissored back toward town through the mud.

Petunia called cheery words to Peter [illegible] ...and his family. But she didn't feel as [illegible] ...cheerful as her voice sounded. Her heart [illegible] ...sank as she watched the water slowly [illegible] ...rising.

[illegible] ...Every now and then a piece of roof [illegible] ...would break away and float off. [illegible] ...Once a whole chimney crashed [illegible] ...down into the flood.

[illegible] ...ignored her, but soon they were clinging to the topmost peak of the roof. There was no higher place to go. If Perry didn't come soon, they would be swept off the roof.

The water was [illegible] ...around Peter's legs when Petunia heard a shout. Around the curve of the river [illegible] ...came a long rowboat. Perry was in the boat with two men. Petunia's heart almost stopped beating with her happy relief.

The men moved to the roof and strong arms lifted Peter and his family to safety.

Hours later as they all sat in the warm kitchen of Perry's home the rain stopped and a pale sun shone on the drenched world.

"The flood go down now," Peter Pig said. "And we're all safe thanks to Perry and Petunia. You two are real heroes."

Perry blushed but Petunia didn't because she was too busy being glad that she had gone with Perry [illegible] ...instead of staying [illegible] ...on the roof.
